Overview

A power of attorney does not cover every situation. When an adult loses the capacity to make decisions, and no valid legal instrument is in place, or the existing documents prove insufficient, the only path forward is a court-supervised guardianship or conservatorship. Many families assume this process is straightforward: that the court will simply appoint the closest relative and move on. That assumption is incorrect.

For most families, petitioning for legal authority over a parent or sibling is among the most difficult decisions they will face. Massachusetts Probate and Family Courts and Rhode Island Probate Courts scrutinize every petition carefully. The court evaluates the proposed guardian's suitability, the incapacitated person's specific needs, and any competing interests before granting authority over another adult's personal or financial decisions. Cohen Cleary represents families and individuals navigating these proceedings throughout Massachusetts and Rhode Island, preparing petitions that address the court's concerns before they become obstacles.

How We Help Families Petition for Adult Guardianship

Filing for guardianship or conservatorship in Massachusetts requires a medical certificate from a licensed physician confirming the individual's incapacity and a clinical team report evaluating the person's functional limitations. These documents are not formalities. Probate courts rely heavily on the quality and specificity of the medical evidence, and a vague or incomplete certificate can delay the proceeding or result in denial.

We prepare petitions for full and limited guardianship, conservatorship, and combined appointments. For families facing urgent circumstances, such as a parent who has been hospitalized and cannot consent to necessary treatment, we file temporary or emergency petitions to secure immediate authority while the permanent case proceeds.

Our practice also includes Rogers guardianship petitions, which authorize extraordinary medical treatment decisions, including the administration of antipsychotic medication, under court supervision through a Rogers monitor. In Rhode Island, parallel proceedings follow similar principles, though the terminology differs: Rhode Island designates a guardian of the person for personal and healthcare decisions and a guardian of the estate for financial management.

When families disagree about who should serve, we represent petitioners and interested parties in contested proceedings, presenting evidence of suitability and addressing the court's preference for the least restrictive alternative.

Guardian and Conservator Obligations After Appointment

Every guardianship or conservatorship carries ongoing obligations that extend well beyond the initial court appointment. We prepare clients for these responsibilities from the outset:

- Guardians must file annual reports documenting the incapacitated person's condition, living arrangement, and care plan.
- Conservators must file detailed financial accountings with the court, typically on an annual basis.
- Most conservators are required to post a surety bond protecting the ward's assets against mismanagement.
- Rogers monitors must report on treatment compliance to the court following each review period.

Failure to meet these obligations can result in removal, surcharge, or both. We build compliance into the guardianship plan from day one.

Frequently Asked Questions About Filing for Guardianship

What is the difference between a guardian and a conservator in Massachusetts?

In Massachusetts, a guardian has authority over an incapacitated person's personal and healthcare decisions, while a conservator manages the person's financial affairs and assets. A court may appoint one or both, depending on the individual's needs. In Rhode Island, the equivalent roles are referred to as guardian of the person (for personal and healthcare decisions) and guardian of the estate (for financial management).

What medical evidence is required to file for adult guardianship?

Massachusetts requires a medical certificate from a licensed physician and a clinical team report evaluating the individual's functional capacity. These documents must detail the nature and extent of the incapacity. The court relies on this evidence to determine whether guardianship is necessary and what level of authority is appropriate.

How long does the guardianship appointment process take?

Timelines vary depending on whether the petition is contested. An uncontested guardianship in Massachusetts typically takes several weeks from filing to appointment. Emergency or temporary guardianship petitions can be heard on shorter notice when the incapacitated person faces an immediate risk. Contested proceedings involving disputes over who should serve may take significantly longer.

Can a family member be denied appointment as guardian?

Yes. The person you assume the court will appoint is not always the person the court selects. Massachusetts probate courts evaluate every proposed guardian based on suitability, proximity, relationship quality, and potential conflicts of interest. Family disagreements, geographic distance, or a history of financial mismanagement can lead the court to appoint a different individual or a professional fiduciary.
