Insurance Claims and Disputes

Overview

A claim denial letter from your insurance company is not the final word on your coverage. It is the starting point for a dispute that, handled correctly, often produces a different result. Insurance adjusters are trained to minimize payouts within policy terms, and the initial coverage determination reflects the insurer's position, not necessarily an accurate reading of your policy.

Many policyholders accept that first denial or lowball settlement without realizing they have both the legal right and practical leverage to push back. Massachusetts and Rhode Island law impose specific obligations on insurers to handle claims in good faith, and violations of those obligations carry real consequences. Cohen Cleary represents homeowners, auto policyholders, and business owners in disputes over denied claims, coverage underpayments, and bad faith insurance practices. We know how these disputes are evaluated, what documentation moves the needle, and when litigation becomes the most efficient path to resolution.

Pursuing Denied Claims and Insurance Underpayments

Insurance disputes take different forms depending on the policy type and the insurer's basis for its coverage decision. Our work in this area spans:

- Homeowners insurance denials involving fire, water, wind, and theft claims, including disputes over depreciation calculations and replacement cost valuations
- Auto insurance disputes, including collision claims, comprehensive coverage disagreements, and uninsured or underinsured motorist claims
- Commercial and specialty policy disputes where business interruption, property damage, liability, or professional coverage has been denied or underpaid
- Bad faith claims under Massachusetts General Laws Chapter 93A and Chapter 176D, which impose affirmative duties on insurers to investigate, evaluate, and settle claims fairly

Massachusetts Chapter 176D defines specific unfair claim settlement practices, including failing to conduct a reasonable investigation, misrepresenting policy provisions, and offering substantially less than what the claim is worth. When an insurer violates these standards, the policyholder may pursue a claim under Chapter 93A, which allows recovery of multiple damages and attorney's fees. Before filing suit, Massachusetts law requires a 30-day demand letter outlining the insurer's violations. We build these cases from the documentation forward, reviewing the insurer's claim file, adjuster correspondence, reserve activity, and any independent assessments to match insurer conduct against the statutory standards that the Division of Insurance enforces.

How Policy Interpretation Shapes Every Insurance Dispute

Most policyholders have never read the exclusions, conditions, or sublimits in their insurance policies. That gap is where insurers gain leverage. A denial based on a policy exclusion you never reviewed is still a denial, and contesting it requires more than disagreement. It requires a documented analysis of the policy language against the facts of the loss. We tell our clients that understanding your own policy is the first strategic step. Our attorneys analyze policy language against the insurer's stated basis for denial and identify where that interpretation fails to account for Massachusetts law, which construes ambiguous policy terms in favor of the insured.

Frequently Asked Questions About Denied Insurance Claims

Can I sue my insurance company for denying my claim in Massachusetts?

Yes. If your insurer denied your claim without a reasonable basis, you may have grounds for a breach of contract action and potentially a bad faith claim under Chapter 93A. Massachusetts law requires insurers to investigate and evaluate claims fairly, and policyholders who can demonstrate violations may recover damages beyond the original claim amount, including multiple damages and attorney's fees.

What is bad faith insurance in Massachusetts?

Bad faith occurs when an insurer fails to meet its legal obligations under Chapter 176D, which defines specific unfair settlement practices. Examples include failing to conduct a reasonable investigation, denying a claim without explanation, unreasonably delaying payment, and offering a settlement substantially below the claim's documented value. A bad faith finding can trigger liability under Chapter 93A.

How long do I have to dispute an insurance claim denial?

Deadlines vary depending on the policy type and the basis for the dispute. Breach of contract claims in Massachusetts generally carry a six-year statute of limitations, but many policies contain shorter internal deadlines for filing proofs of loss, requesting appraisals, or initiating suit. Missing a policy-imposed deadline can forfeit your right to dispute the denial, even if the statute of limitations has not expired. Reviewing your policy's conditions section promptly after a denial is critical.

What is an appraisal clause, and should I use it?

Many property insurance policies contain an appraisal clause that allows either party to request an independent appraisal of the loss amount when there is a disagreement over valuation. Appraisal can resolve underpayment disputes more quickly than litigation, but it only addresses the amount of loss, not whether the claim is covered. If the insurer has denied coverage entirely or is acting in bad faith, appraisal alone will not resolve the dispute, and litigation may be necessary.
