Overview

A direct bequest to a person with disabilities, even a modest one, can trigger a benefits disqualification that costs far more than the inheritance was worth. Supplemental Security Income, MassHealth, and other means-tested programs impose strict asset limits. Exceeding those limits by even a small margin can result in months of lost coverage, denied services, and a painful process to reestablish eligibility. The financial damage often dwarfs the value of the gift itself.

Special needs trusts (also called supplemental needs trusts) exist to prevent exactly this outcome. These instruments allow families to set aside resources that enhance the quality of life for a person with disabilities without jeopardizing the public benefits they depend on for housing, medical care, and daily support. The structure of the trust, not just its existence, determines whether it works. A poorly drafted trust can fail to protect benefits just as surely as a direct bequest.

How We Structure Special Needs Trusts to Protect Disability Benefits

The distinction between a first-party special needs trust and a third-party special needs trust is not just a technical classification. It determines who can fund the trust, how distributions are managed, and what happens to remaining assets when the beneficiary dies. We tell our clients that choosing the wrong structure is one of the most costly mistakes in special needs planning.

A third-party SNT, funded by parents, grandparents, or other family members, carries no Medicaid payback obligation. Remaining assets pass to successor beneficiaries chosen by the family. A first-party SNT, funded with the beneficiary's own assets (typically from a personal injury settlement or inheritance), requires a Medicaid payback provision: remaining funds must reimburse the state for benefits paid during the beneficiary's lifetime. Individual first-party trusts are generally available only to beneficiaries under age 65. For older beneficiaries, a pooled trust is typically the appropriate alternative.

We also evaluate pooled trusts administered by nonprofits, practical for beneficiaries with smaller funding amounts or those who have aged out of individual first-party eligibility. For eligible beneficiaries, ABLE accounts offer a complementary savings tool that works alongside a properly drafted special needs trust.

Our Approach to Special Needs Planning

Every special needs trust engagement follows a structured process:

Benefit program assessment

We identify every means-tested program the beneficiary receives or may need, including SSI, MassHealth, and Section 8 housing, then map the trust structure to each program's rules.

Care team coordination

We work with financial advisors, care managers, and benefits specialists to confirm the trust complements the beneficiary's broader support plan.

Trust type selection

Based on funding source, beneficiary's age, and family goals, we recommend the appropriate vehicle: third-party SNT, first-party SNT, pooled trust, or a combination.

Trustee guidance

We help families evaluate individual, corporate, and hybrid trustee arrangements, with attention to fiduciary responsibilities that many lay trustees underestimate.

Frequently Asked Questions About Special Needs Trusts

What is the difference between a first-party and third-party special needs trust?

A third-party special needs trust is funded by someone other than the beneficiary, such as a parent or grandparent. It carries no Medicaid payback requirement, and remaining assets pass to family members at the beneficiary's death. A first-party special needs trust is funded with the beneficiary's own assets. When the beneficiary dies, remaining funds must first reimburse the state for Medicaid benefits paid on the beneficiary's behalf.

Will a special needs trust affect my family member's SSI or Medicaid eligibility?

A properly drafted special needs trust should not affect SSI, Medicaid, or other means-tested eligibility. The trust must be structured so the beneficiary does not have direct access to the principal. Distributions must supplement, not replace, what government programs provide. Expenditures for food and shelter may trigger a reduction in SSI benefits, so distribution planning requires attention to program rules.

What can a special needs trust pay for?

A special needs trust can pay for goods and services that government benefits do not cover, including education, recreation, personal care attendants, transportation, technology, home furnishings, and travel. The trust cannot give cash directly to the beneficiary, and certain expenditures (particularly for food and housing) may reduce the beneficiary's SSI benefit. Experienced counsel helps ensure distributions enhance quality of life without creating unintended benefit reductions.

What is a pooled trust, and when is it a better option?

A pooled trust is managed by a nonprofit that combines the assets of multiple beneficiaries for investment while maintaining separate accounts for each individual. Pooled trusts are a practical choice when available funding is too small to justify a standalone trust. They accept both first-party and third-party assets and are particularly useful for beneficiaries over age 65 who face restrictions on establishing individual first-party trusts.
